

THE LITTLEST ANGELS

Marian Knotts

Vanderbilt University, Peabody College

The Littlest Angels

“The streets of heaven are too crowded with angels, but every time we think we have measured our capacity to meet a challenge, we look up and are reminded that that capacity may well be limitless.”

- The West Wing, Jed Bartlet, “20 Hours in America”

I. December 14, 2012

I imagine the decision when it was made was much like a domino tipped ever so slightly by the hissing exhale that escaped between the pinched lips of someone in pain.
The teetering bones leaning just the right way, at just the right moment and the effect much the same as the aftershocks of a supernova.
Stardust of those moments scattered across the kaleidoscope of the sky.
At night, I close my eyes and see mammoth giants quiet with resolution circling their young as a lone wolf tears flesh to ribbons and the vinyl white tile is soaked crimson.
I hear their cries of anguish, I watch as they refuse to move.
I wonder, how do you stop an exploding man?

II. April 20, 1999

Twenty turns around the sun and yet we have remained stagnant. We are complacent in the fight for our lives. When we do square up it is as if the strike from the right hook surprises us. Despite the fact that the same move just bloodied our nose. The marks have only just turned a faint hue of green as the next swatch of purple blooms on the line of our jaw.
We refuse to take a new stance.
We refuse to learn from countless losses.
And so we find ourselves constantly knocked to the mat in a pool of our own blood.

III. Bedtime stories, gone too far

You're older now, a parent yourself.
And with each new story you pull her closer, holding her heart close to yours the rhythm of the two beats a constant anchor to keep you tethered to reality to the here, and now as the darkness does its best to pull you down too.
And you bite your lip
so hard you draw a drop of blood, as she tilts her chin towards the sky.
Until the pale blue meets yours and with all the seriousness that a seven-year-old could be expected to muster she asks,
"Where did my friends go?"

IV. A Rainy Day in May, Yesterday

It is raining outside.
Slowly at first and then an onslaught, as if God made the decision that it was best to wash it all away — a second flood; another chance to start anew.
And all you can do is sit clutching the pillow to your chest and hitting refresh to catch the world, or at least their world burning down around you, around them in real time.
A thousand miles away you can hear the shadows of screams, splintering the sky with an explosion of shards. And you feel this newest affront as if it were your own.
As if it were the exploding memories of your friends,
your family,
scattering to the heavens.

In Memoriam on April 20, 2019